» Mayoress Defects to BNP

At a press conference on 13th March Keighley and Worth Valley BNP announced that a high-quality councillor, Rose Thomson, would be representing the Party on Keighley Town Council in addition to councillor Angela Clarke. Formerly an Independent Councillor, Rose Thomson was also the Mayoress for Keighley. However, in a fit of childish pique the Mayor, Tony Wright, has stripped her of her title as Mayoress, stating: "Councillor Thomson's duties as Mayoress will cease forthwith as I, along with many parts of the Keighley community, would find her affiliation offensive."

At the well attended press conference (which led to a factual report and photograph in the Daily Telegraph among other newspapers) Rose Thomson stated that Britain was too over-crowded to cope with any more immigration and that the whole welfare state was in danger of collapsing. The final straw was seeing the funding for her estate get cut severely at a time when the more 'enriched' (i.e. having the advantage of Muslim immigrants?) areas of Keighley were wondering how they were going to spend their £20 million allocation of council funds.

» Take-away Horror Story Ignored

Blackpool Magistrates Court last month heard chilling details of how a 14-year-old girl, Charlene Downes, was alleged to have been murdered, and her body was cut up and disposed of via a takeaway, with late night customers being offered kebabs and burgers at Funny Boyz in Dickson Road containing the remains of the schoolgirl.

One would have expected that the Sun and the Mirror would be leading the national media coverage of such a gruesome story, but not a word appeared in any national paper. Could it possibly be because the person in the dock charged with the murder was called Iyad Albattakhi and the man charged with assisting in the disposal of her body was called Mohammed Raveshi? Police are also said to be working on the forensic theory that her bones were ground for use as tile grout. Perhaps more details will be revealed, and even reported nationally, when the case next comes to court. But don't count on it.

» Rape and Murder

The trial for the horrendous rape, torture and murder and attempted murder of two white girls in Reading did, of course, receive widespread publicity, although BBC TV refused to show the photographs of the five young men of West Indian origin and a Kosovan illegal immigrant who were all found guilty. But the national media is becoming markedly reticent to report on the growing number of murders and rapes of young white women by 'Asian' men (and they are not Hindus or Sikhs). Here are just two instances from local papers.

Kimberley Fuller, 19, had her throat cut in a Rotherham night club by an 'Asian' man. Apparently he had pinched her backside and she forcefully told him off for doing so.

A Moroccan drifter who raped a woman in her own home two weeks after illegally entering Britain was jailed for life. Redoan Aitraho had already shot a shop cashier in the face, killing her instantly, during a robbery in Germany in 1994, spent time in prison in Spain for robbery, and committed offences in Morocco and Holland.

» An Ulster Loyalist?

Serious questions about bail policies in Ulster's courts were raised last month after it emerged that a number of those arrested during a dramatic police raid on a north Belfast bar are already charged with terrorist offences. The Belfast Telegraph, March 9th, said: "Leading loyalist Ihab Shoukri and 16 other men were arrested as police raided The Alexandra bar in Tiger's Bay last night as part of an operation against the UDA."

Meanwhile the British Government is now going to reinstate the parliamentary allowances of four Sinn Fein MPs (the 'house-trained' wing of the IRA) of £260,000, although they refuse to take their seats, plus a new payment of £85,000 for parliamentary research.

» EU Praise For UK Jobs Sell-out

Vladimir Spidla, EU employment commissar, sorry, commissioner, led praise for Britain in Brussels last month "as a shining example" to other EU countries for letting in workers from the former Communist bloc. Apart from Britain, Ireland and Sweden, all other nations from the old 15-member EU have imposed quotas and permit schemes to shield their domestic workers from the flood of "Polish plumbers" and other cheap labour. Britain has let in at least 370,000 low wage East Europeans, with the approval of the three main parties, and at a time when our true unemployment figure has risen to over two million.

Mr Sidla, a former Czech prime minister, said: "Free movement of workers is economically rational and is enshrined in EU treaties."

The BNP says that it is just one of many reasons why we should withdraw from the EU.

Local Elections: What's Islam Got To Do With It?

» One or two readers have asked us why the main slogan on BNP leaflets for next month's local elections is "Are You Concerned About the Growth of Islam in Britain?" Although these readers have expressed deep concern over the Islamification of Britain that is now gathering momentum, they contend that it is only a secondary matter when we are discussing local affairs, even in Bradford, Birmingham or East London. This may appear to be the position, but we believe that it will very soon be the main problem affecting all aspects of British politics, British culture and our way of life. For that reason it has been decided to utilise the local election campaign to let the people know how important the issue is and that the BNP is the only party that is being honest about the severity of the threat it poses.

The fact is that fundamentalist agitators make it perfectly clear that their purpose in the UK is not so much to look after the rights of ordinary law-abiding Muslims, who have the right to practice their religion in our community, but to make Islam the dominant religion in Britain and turn our country into an Islamic theocracy. It is noticeable that such a religious threat does not come from the Jews, Hindus, Sikhs or Buddhists in our midst.

Harold Wilson observed back in the sixties that the public's memory for most political issues is not much longer than a week. Allowing for a degree of cynicism this is basically true and our people need to be reminded regularly of the Muslim terrorist bombings in London last summer; of the banners displayed by young Muslim demonstrators calling for beheadings and repeat bombing campaigns against us; of the recruitment for violence by such clerics as Abu Hamza. Fortunately, all these points are being emphasised in the on-going Old Bailey trial of the 'home grown' Muslims linked to an al-Qa'eda gang who were planning a murderous campaign in Britain of an even greater severity than the London Tube bombings.

Even if an unlikely outcome of the Old Bailey trial were to be an end to any further Muslim terrorist threat in Britain, it would not signify an end to the threat of Islamification of Britain. For one thing, we cannot ignore the fact that there are now over 700 madrassas in Britain where imams who are outside the law are brainwashing young Muslim boys. If the majority of Muslims, who are peaceful and just seeking a better life, did nothing but continue to have larger families than any other sector of the UK population, then they would be the majority, without any further immigration, in probably less than 60 years. As it is, I have recently noted the new phenomenon of Muslim women, attired in their usual tents, in shops in Suffolk villages and small towns - an observation that others are now making from the Scottish Highlands down to west Cornwall.

Selling Off Our Municipal Assets

BNP candidates in next month's elections are, of course, also stressing BNP policy of putting British born people's interests first, especially in housing, schooling and childcare. During doorstep canvassing and in interviews with the local press it is being made clear that we must stop selling off our municipal assets and local public services so that private companies and big business corporations can make profits (this also comes into the article by Nick Griffin over the page). This applies to refuse collection, school catering, libraries, among other local services.

Another issue of growing importance that threatens local democracy, and which the BNP would tackle, is New Labour's latest gagging operation which prevents elected councillors debating and voting in the council chamber on certain local affairs. This has come about since Labour's buffoon-in-chief, John Prescott, imposed his new Code of Conduct in 2001, enforced by a "monitoring officer" in each council.

For example, a Norfolk Breckland councillor, Michael Fanthorpe, was told not to speak at a debate to decide on plans for 65 houses in Dereham - his home town. His crime was being quoted in the local daily paper as saying he would fight the plans "tooth and nail"; an act that in the eyes of the council indicated a closed mind and bias.

Similarly Alan Quinn, who had been an Aylsham town councillor for 17 years, quit last year after monitoring officers at Broadland District Council advised him not to take part in debates on a planned supermarket because he had voiced his opposition in the press.

In its review of the Code of Conduct, the regulations that govern councillors, the Standards Board for England judges the issue so serious it has called on the Government to re-empower councillors to "support the democratic right of the local community." This has the backing of all BNP councillors.

New Labour & the Return of Fascism

» Nick Griffin points out that complaints about the Blair regime giving peerages for cash miss the real problem - the corporate smash and grab raid on priceless British assets

» As the Blair regime sinks beneath a tsunami of sleaze, the media - ready as always to over-simplify everything - have largely missed the point: The rotten heart of the matter is not cash for peerages, but cash for the 'right' to asset-strip Britain.

Especially since New Labour took a wrecking ball to centuries of constitutional tradition, a seat in the House of Lords and an ermine collar have bestowed little real honour and even less direct political power. But the companies and super-rich individuals who have poured millions into Labour's party coffers and private pockets are not interested in honour or politics - the name of the game is access to potential profits.

What has happened has gone unnoticed by journalists fixated on the mere trappings of power, and uncriticised by the Tories whose necessary union and privatisation reforms went too far and prepared the ground for New Labour's great betrayal. But the real scandal is the way in which the Blair regime has allowed its corporate donors a prime place at the trough it has filled with the enormous wealth of our municipal assets and public services.

From playing fields to the job of setting up a Big Brother Identity Card scheme, from council housing stock to the running of prisons, from Public Private Finance initiatives that let giant companies cherry pick profitable patients and leave the hopeless cases and the mistakes for the NHS to the contracting out of much of the Ministry of Defence, the list is enormous.

Have a look at who now owns and is making a fat profit on your water, electricity or gas supplies - the odds are you'll find a French, German or Spanish multinational. Money which was once available to plough back into Britain's public services is pouring into private profit and very often into foreign banks after minimal taxation here in the UK.

SCAM

And what has been done so far is only the beginning: the plans and pilot schemes are also in place for flogging off the Department of Work and Pensions, the Royal Mail, our schools and every last service run by your local council. This latter rip-off is already underway in East Yorkshire, where everything from council wage packets to emptying the bins is now being run as a for-profit scam operated by German-based media conglomerate Bertelsmann's.

Dozens of big, mainly Labour-run councils are in negotiations to follow suit, thus ending an ancient tradition of democratically-controlled local government services run in the interest of the residents who pay for them.

Public assets built up first by Joseph Chamberlain's municipal works Toryism, and then by generations of decent Old Labour mayors, are being quietly handed over to giant private corporations

If anyone tries to tell you that all this is being done in the interests of efficiency, ask them two simple questions: First, have they tried using Directory Enquiries since the old Operator Service and 192 was replaced by a jostling herd of over-advertised information-for-profit sharks? And, second, have any of New Labour's privatisation through the back door schemes been the subject of informed public debate or even clear explanation?

For if the selling off of the family silver and the giving away of the family home had actually been in our interests, it would all have been done openly, as when Margaret Thatcher denationalised, for example, British Steel. But Blair & Co have done it all behind closed doors and shielded by secrecy, spin and outright lies. Have you ever heard (except from the BNP) about the East Yorkshire pilot scheme to turn all council services into private profit centres for foreign corporations? The secrecy surrounding such sweetheart deals tells us all we need to know about what is really going on.

SERVICE & VALUE?

Similarly, if the aim was to improve services and value for taxpayers' money by introducing competition and the profit motive, then ways could have been found to give council employees and such like bonuses for fast and efficient work, rather than replacing them with East European contract staff programme of back-door privatisation is a theft of our national Commonwealth. It is quite literally without parallel since the Enclosure Acts of the 18th Century (the peak of a movement that started in Tudor England and ended with the Clearances of the Scottish Highlands) stole the very land from our ancestors and turned our Commons into the ill-gotten private wealth of the few already rich enough to legalise their theft through Parliament.

This incestuously close link between the giant companies benefiting from the new system, and the politicians passing the statutes that bring it into being also suggest another historical parallel - this corporate/government tie-up is the key relationship at the heart of classic Fascism.

Forget about black shirts, dosing opponents with castor oil and anti-Semitism. Political uniforms were standard even for many democratic parties in Europe in the 1920s. The violence of Fascism was overwhelmingly a reaction to Bolshevik brutality and, far from being brought to power by the brutality of fascist fascism is properly seen as a form of intensely idealistic - almost religious - commitment to an ideology of national rebirth, coupled with a Keynesian attitude to government spending and an extremely close relationship between the ruling political elite and certain favoured business interests.

A FORM OF FASCISM

The Blair regime clearly qualifies as a type of fascism on all three grounds:

First, the creation of 'Cool Britannia' (a phrase now dropped as ridiculous, but which summed up the extent of Tony's messianic vision) has involved smashing centuries of constitutional settlements, a gigantic programme of genetic, cultural and social engineering through mass immigration and the extension of bureaucracy, and is openly flaunted as the wholesale remaking of every aspect of British society.

Second, Gordon Brown's reputation for financial prudence will one day in the not too distant future be recognised by overtaxed and debt-burdened millions as a combination of pure hoax and unearned good fortune receiving minimum wages out of massive payments to agencies whose bosses can afford to go to private hospitals which are not riddled with MRSA.

Wholly unjustified in economic or social terms, New Labour's rolling squadrismo, Mussolini had to wage a relentless struggle against such extremism to get and keep control of Italy. And his march on Rome was financed, not as Tony Blair has been by Lord Levy, but by his Jewish mistress.

With those cliches dealt with, in terms of temporary global economic conditions. The reality is massive borrowing to fund public expenditure - an approach as Keynesian as Oswald Mosley's famous Birmingham Proposals, except that the money that Brown raises is not used to 'pump prime' productive industry but to create useless employment for an army of nanny state parasites.

The third requirement, the unusual intense relationship between business and politics, has been all too clearly exposed in recent weeks, but the shameless sleaze around the granting of peerages has, as already noted, somewhat obscured the real significance of the links.

This is best understood by looking at a more recent hybrid of the fascist archetype - modern Japan. In 1945, a small cadre of high-ranking Japanese civil servants and state financial advisors took advantage of the devastation of war and the desire of the Americans to see an economically strong but militarily weak and politically compliant Japan arise from the ashes as an anti-Communist financial ally.

They created a system in which the power of the people's elected representatives was heavily circumscribed by the far greater behind-the-scenes influence of the autonomous and self-perpetuating Ministry of Finance, and of the giant corporations. Japan's phenomenal economic growth was channelled through those corporations, each of which was allowed to carve itself out a huge vertical slice of the economy in return for running things so that its own financial interest dovetailed with that of the Japanese nation.

POPULAR DESIRE

As in pre-war Italy, democracy and consumerism were largely sacrificed in order to build a strong economy and to satisfy a partly natural, partly propaganda-induced popular desire to be part of a powerful nation.

In the case of both Italy and Japan, however, the industries that were favoured by the state were essentially productive ones. As a result they produced a surplus of real wealth, a significant proportion of which 'trickled down' to ordinary people. This not only legitimised and popularised the regimes, but also provided extra buying and savings power which in turn fuelled further economic growth.

As a system it has much more to commend it than Communism, and has given capitalism a run for its money as well. But apart from its incompatibility with north west European individualism, it has a second, even bigger, fatal flaw: It is based and designed for perpetual economic growth.

Council services are becoming private profit centres

This concept might have appeared possible and desirable in the full flush of 20th century industrialism, when most of the world was still locked in medieval feudalism. But now we are nearer to the endemic environmental collapse, refugee floods and resource wars which inevitably lie at the end of the endless growth myth road.

The world could have sustained the endless growth of Italy, and indeed the rest of the white world, and of Japan as well, for a fair old time to come. But throw China and India into the balance, and the tipping point to an interrelated set of catastrophes rushes towards our civilisation like a high speed train.

Thus to note the long-term unsustainability of classic industrial fascism is, however, something of an aside from our study of Blairism. For the New Labour version of this old creed is a hybrid in which productive industry plays very little part. And here - in the short-term at least - is the real problem with Benito Blair.

Earlier brands of fascism at least had the virtue of linking the State with big businesses whose operations actually added value to raw materials and created real wealth. When such corporations worked to shape government policies for their own interests, there was accordingly an automatic benefit to the nation, and often to individual workers or communities.

Profits made in company operation

A tended to be reinvested in company operation B, which was invariably in the same country, not least because the government had the power and the will to insist on it. And since both operations were adding value to the economy as a whole, overall national wealth and the government's tax take increased. Thus, even if the company had to persuade the government to bend a certain rule or destroy some inefficient old fashioned way of doing things in order to get operation B up and running, there was at least the consolation prize of extra productivity, jobs and debt-free government spending.

EU HEADQUARTERS: Where overpaid new ways to infringe our freedoms

The big problem with the corporations and self-made multi-millionaires buzzing around the Blair dung heap is that, overwhelmingly, their profits are made in essentially parasitic service industries.

Of course government agencies need up-to-date IT systems, airbases and prisons need guarding, and local councils need their services provision managed, but none of these things creates real wealth. In fact, even worse, they all consume huge amounts of tax money.

CORPORATE SHARKS

Furthermore, because it is in the very nature of corporate capitalism to be constantly on the lookout for fresh business opportunities, the sharks with the ear of the Blair regime are ceaselessly eyeing Britain's remaining public and municipal assets in order to snap up other pieces of our national fabric.

And because nearly all those assets - although essential building blocks of a civilised society - are essentially not-for-profit and non-wealth producing, once they are taken over by the corporations they remain non-wealth producing but, being thenceforth run for profit, become an even bigger drain on the productive segments of the nation than they were before.

The way in which we thus get - and look set to continue getting - the worst of both worlds was recently summed up by the veteran anti-EU author Rodney Atkinson:

"Corporatism is, of course, the basic building brick of all fascist systems.....The unholy alliance between business and the state leads to mutual back scratching and mutual bailouts. The new leadership of the Conservative Party in Britain is principally corporatist with David Cameron seeking to give business 'social responsibilities' by which he means to offload new 'Government services' (for which the state would otherwise have to raise taxes) onto business and shareholders. The resulting destruction of a healthy balance of powers between independent wealth creators on the one hand and democratic public service provider on the other is thereby fatally undermined. When business and government combine there can be only one loser - the people."

Atkinson also recognises not just the nature of the Beast but also its essentially foreign origins. He describes it as "a corrupted half-way house which is neither socialism nor free enterprise capitalism but a corporatist, parasitic compromise between big business and big government," and points out that "the close links between the Blair government and big business are in a way the defining alliance of his regime, mimicking - as he did in most things - the political economy of the Franco-German axis."

Big business is as efficient as ever at creating profit opportunities for itself, but in this field it can only do so by persuading the government to permit it to loot the state and its public assets. The fact that this model of economic and political management is at the heart of the European Union only makes it more compelling to Blair & Co., dedicated as they are to imposing EU ways of running our affairs in every area of our national life.

As a result, when a future nationalist government sets about bringing home from Brussels the sovereignty and the powers that successive Conservative and Labour governments have given away, there will also have to be a huge operation to restore democratic control and either genuinely private or proper public ownership to our essential national and local services.

Any party which doesn't understand this fact, or which refuses to articulate it for fear of the power of the vested interests that have Blair and Cameron in their pockets, is part of the problem rather than the solution.

This is one of the things that marks UKIP's junketing leadership as worse than useless, for by diverting patriotic resistance against the EU into a policy-free, avoid-confrontation-at-all-costs dead end, they prove themselves to be incapable of understanding, let alone getting to grips with, the other great issues of our time.

The political elite's surrender to corporate vested interests is one of those great issues, for the fact that their operations are essentially parasitic and non-productive means that the whole thing is unsustainable. Either Britain must summon the will and energy to make a giant bonfire of these privatised bureaucracies and tax-eaters, or they will bleed our economy and productive classes to death.

BOOK REVIEW: The West's Last Chance

» The rise of militant Islam throughout the Western world is a matter of great concern for a wide variety of people. For decent Europeans it is viewed as a threat to the traditions of Europe - a violent uprising aimed at exterminating the ideas and culture of our people as they have evolved over thousands of years. Yet the rise of militant Islam is also causing serious headaches for many within the political Establishments of the Western World - especially in media and government. Such figures care nothing for European tradition and culture and in fact view them with utter contempt, although they certainly pay lip service to them when it suits them. To them militant Islam is a danger because it has the potential to become the single biggest threat to the evil aims of the New World Order that has been seen in the world for a good few decades.

Tony Blankley is a thoroughly Establishment character, yet his 'Islam Bashing' goes far beyond the decidedly boring 'Moderate Muslims vs Nasty Fundamentalists' discussion favoured by the majority of Establishment figures who decide to venture into this previously forbidden realm.

Blankley views with alarm the fact that were current trends to continue, Europe would be thoroughly taken over by Muslims by demographics alone. He is also quite 'un-PC' in the way in which he describes the violent working-class backlash against Muslims in Holland following the vicious murder of Theo Van Gogh, which saw a number of mosques put to the flame. Rather than condemning this behaviour, Blankley appears to view such events as reassuring signs that Europe still has some fight left in her.

Blankley begins his book by describing an imaginative and yet all too imaginable 'worst case scenario' in which large scale protests by Europe-based Muslims against certain European works of art set off a chain of events that end with the declaration of Sharia Law for all Muslims in Europe, and the subsequent isolation of the USA from her former European allies/lapdogs (delete as applicable). Viewed in the context of the recent mass protests about the Danish 'Mohammed cartoons' and the revelation that 40% of UK Muslims admit to wanting to be governed by Sharia law, there is clearly more to Blankley's 'worst case scenario' than mere fantasy.

The West's Last Stand is a fine read but for the Nationalist reader it falls short of greatness because its author clearly has one foot placed far too firmly in the Establishment (i.e. Enemy) camp. This prohibits the author from delving deeper into the politically incorrect mine into which he has merely poked his head. Blankley also appears to hold a number of core beliefs that many will disagree with.

He happily refers to the exploits of war-criminals Bush and Blair as 'our war effort' and believes their invasion and occupation of Afghanistan and Iraq to have been justified. He has no objections to the monstrous amount of money taken from the US taxpayer and used to keep afloat the bandit state of Israel. When discussing the issue of the huge growth of the number of Muslims in Europe and its potentially devastating effects on the Western World, he talks of Europe's governing elites 'failing to take action' as though it has not been these very same governing elites that have brought these people to our countries in the first place and have done, and continue to do, everything possible to undermine the cultural and ethnic character of the nations of Europe. The problems threatening Europe's very existence have been created by design and mass regime change in Europe and the USA will be required before they can be properly solved. Yet such sentiments appear alien to Blankley.

So why are we selling this book? Blankley answers this for us himself when he describes the surge of radical Islam in Europe as having the potential to be the ultimate wake-up call for Europe, which could help to trigger her rebirth and split from the degeneracy and filth associated with the second half of the 20th Century. If Islamic fundamentalists were just a bit more patient and behaved more like most other non-indigenous residents of Europe, then demographics alone would hand them this continent on a plate in a matter of decades.

Yet suicide bombings and the other thoroughly conspicuous behaviour being increasingly exhibited by growing numbers of Europe's Muslims is leading more and more of our people to awake from their blissful slumber and take a stand against the menace within our midst. The fact that militant Islam is also deemed as a threat to our mutual enemies in the Western political and media establishments means that increasing numbers of Establishment commentators are legitimising previously taboo opinions on race and immigration, and we must ensure that this situation is used to further our cause.

This is the most important point here. Few serious nationalists believe Islam, militant or otherwise, to be our main enemy. Yet it would be unforgivable if we were not to use the current mood of the British public to our advantage. This is not to suggest that we should jump on the Establishment bandwagon as such, but rather work to ensure that this particular bandwagon is one that is used to the benefit of our cause at least as much as it benefits the cause of our greater enemies who have set it off rolling down the hill. Where this bandwagon will stop, nobody knows, but sitting back and watching it roll away from us down that hill as we fade into obscurity is not an option.

With that in mind I am happy to recommend The West's Last Chance. Blankley has written a thoroughly interesting and, for a mainstream author, controversial book, which will contain much of interest for the reader of Identity. Though some of what he proposes to combat the rise of militant Islam will be opposed by many of us (such as his proposed introduction of identity cards) this book contains a great deal of valuable material on the subject and will equip the reader with new facts and arguments that can be used to further our cause. When a BNP government has taken power in this country and our party stalwarts think back to our historic period of struggle it may well be the rise of militant Islam in Europe that will be regarded as being the single biggest factor that put us firmly on the path to power. With that in mind, enjoy this book.

» John Everett reports on:

A Multicultural Anomaly

» When our grandchildren were removed from our care (although in absolutely good health, for which we have ample photographic evidence), some glaring examples of multicultural anomalies and contradictions became apparent. One of these was literally brought home to us when we had to endure an Asian supervisor at our home on Christmas Eve, being one of the times that we were permitted to have the children in our care. As it happened this person was more sympathetic than some of the other supervisors, but it occurred to me that it could not happen in reverse, i.e. a white Christian being present at a Muslim religious festival. But there were also other examples.

The children were required to attend a children's centre in Sheffield at which it appeared that the majority of the operatives were Asians, although I never saw any Asian children detained there: peculiar to say the least. The implications were either that the Moslem community never, or extremely rarely, had problems necessitating intervention by the social service. But read on.

The following message appeared on MSN Hotmail, <http://www.islamonline.com/cgi-bin-news>, 16th February 2006, on the subject of adoption. Does Islam adopt orphans and take them into their home? Answer: Islam forbids adoption. Allah has forbidden adoption because it causes knowledge of people's lineage to be lost.

I raised this very question of lost lineage some considerable time ago in a letter to my local MP, Richard Caborn, as this is the major worry I have regarding my own grandchildren whom we are not even permitted to see periodically. This could also cast light on an otherwise murky situation and could indicate racial discrimination taking place.

The message was driven home further when I was required to write to the newly formed Complaints Manager (a gentleman with a Muslim name) pleading our case for more periodic contact with the children (incidentally refused) after their removal for enforced adoption. Contemplating this perverse situation, I wondered whether such a situation could possibly happen the other way round, say in a Muslim country. In fact I could not imagine any white European being permitted to operate in an official capacity in any of the countries from which the foreign immigrants to this country derive.

Another example of paternalistic reversal surfaced when our grandchildren were removed from our care by a social worker under the watchful eye of a non-white manager. It hardly does anything to reduce racial antagonisms. In fact it could be expected to create them where they did not previously exist. I say this as someone who actively opposed our domination of other races during the latter part of the British imperial period. I did not envisage the situation being completely turned around, with the indigenous inhabitants being thrust into an occupied status!

Exposing Blair's 'Democracy'

» Tony Holroyd says that it is pitiful that Britain of all nations, and Blair of all people, would invade Iraq in order to bring 'democracy' to her people, in that the Blair-Brown government is in reality not democratic but Marxist-Communist. We should not be fooled by the external features of democracy.

» Britain is a nation that displays all of the external features and machinery of democracy. In spite of this, the political left very carefully controls actual political debate and cultural expression within Britain. The National Union of Journalists (NUJ) sets strict guidelines for the reporting of politically sensitive events, ensuring that there can be no balance of opinion or political impartiality within the media. Politicos within the body of the media carefully doctor all broadcasts, drama, news-scripts, interviews and even advertisements, to ensure that they fulfil and promote certain political ideological viewpoints, such as multiculturalism and racial 'diversity' within Britain.

Public political debate, when it is actually shown on television or in the newspapers, appears to be more concerned with indoctrination, rather than open debate and discussion. For example, prior to the filming of the BBC's Question Time programmes, questions are pre-considered and pre-approved by the BBC's political governors, and audiences and panelists are carefully chosen in order to ensure broad sympathy and endorsement of the preordained political message.

At Westminster, the Labour government has busily constructed a wide framework of laws, designed to restrict political expression on the grounds that discussion of certain topics might 'incite hatred' (or, more likely, threaten the Labour government's political authority).

This level of corruption and autocratic control makes free elections almost redundant. Of what use are free elections, if the public are never able to make judgements on the basis of balanced and impartial information through the media? What value does political campaigning actually serve, if the government institutes laws forbidding discussion of 'taboo' political topics and uses the police force to bully so-called right-wing opposition parties? The truth is that real participatory Democracy, as was practiced in Athens 2500 years ago, is the last thing that a Labour government would want.

Communism, in whatever form it may be packaged, is based upon conformity, uniformity, oppression and unquestioning belief in the rulers of the state and their particular world-view. Such a system requires that individuals remain politically passive, surrendering all authority to the hive. This can be observed in every project that the political left have undertaken, whether it be the state-owned enterprises and worker state gulags of Soviet Russia, or the state-owned bureaucracy of the NHS, the CEEB, the modern Trade Unions, or the ill-fated National Coal Board.

MULTICULTURALISM IS COMMUNISM

The idea of a 'multicultural society' is precious to Communists for two reasons. Firstly, a multiracial worker state was central to Marx's vision. The idea of 'one state for all races' is highly attractive to Communists, who see it as an idealised society. Secondly, many of the supporters of Communism in Britain today are immigrants, who see multiculturalism as a tool for asserting their own interests.

Conformity of opinion, suppression of opposition and tight control over popular culture, are central to the imposition of any autocratic ideal. Britain still retains many of the external features of democracy. In particular, we still have supposedly free elections (although during recent elections in the north of England, vote-rigging was undertaken by New Labour members and supporters).

We also have a media which, in public at least, is not directly controlled by government. This allows the faint-hearted and naive to continue believing that they live in a democratic state, with freedom of thought and expression. But how can any of us really trust our own minds, when the very information that we receive about the world around us is so carefully and thoroughly censored?

Clear examples of government, media and police force political manipulation were seen in the treatment of two murders last summer. The first was the murder of a young black man by a white, axe-wielding maniac, the second was the murder of a young white man on a bus, repeatedly stabbed by a black man. Both murders were horrific and unprovoked. Yet, as Identity readers know, the first murder made front page news and was developed into a national 'anti-racist' political campaigning tool. The second murder was reported towards the end of news broadcasts and like the foul murder of Kriss Donald in Glasgow -was never mentioned again.

Time and time again, we see this double standard applied to racially motivated murders within Britain. If the victim is black, the crime is used as a political campaigning tool and is treated as a nationally serious incident. If the victim is white, the crime is quietly forgotten, often not even be reported in national media. The fact that racially motivated crimes are treated more seriously than others can only be explained by the fact that our Government, Media and Police force are engaged in Communist-style social engineering.

Strip away the veneer of democracy and it is revealed that Britain is now controlled by a Communist government and Communist-dominated media institutions, which harbour evil intentions towards our own people. Every action that the Labour government has taken since coming to power has been aimed at manipulating the truth, politicising and controlling key public bodies and removing the freedom of expression of individuals. Evil took hold in Britain and its key institutions because good people failed to understand the precariousness of freedom and either failed to act in time, or did not wish to rock their own lives by speaking out. The dark veil of Communism now shrouds Britain and darkens all of our futures. We all live in the shadow of our collective failure to recognise this threat before it became too late. How bitterly ironic, that it has now lead us into war under the banner of 'democracy'.

The Road to Hell and the Last Taboo

» The seeds of the permissive society were sown by Roy Jenkins in the sixties. In this article Tim Heydon says that the resultant decay of family values is the road to hell, with the last taboo, euthanasia, about to be broken

» One of the most wrong headed and dangerous remarks ever made was that by Roy Jenkins, when as Home Secretary in the Wilson government he said that: 'The permissive society is the civilised society.' Wrong headed because civilisation is based not on permissiveness but on restraint; dangerous because a society in which permissiveness is the overriding characteristic is one which quickly becomes mired in values which are barbaric, not civilised. Traditional standards, built up over centuries, were not prison walls; they were - until they were breached by the oh-so-clever but stupidly arrogant and deeply foolish liberal left - a dam which held back a flood of dark forces which have been and are destroying our right to call ourselves civilised.

We have seen the slide down the slimy slope of good intentions in innumerable ways, all of which illustrate the process by which well intentioned measures which breach the restraining dam of accumulated wisdom lead inevitably, by a process of incremental steps, to a situation which those who advocated those first measures probably often never envisaged. For example, the attack on censorship has led to a situation where since the ban on D. H. Lawrence's novel 'Lady Chatterley' was fought against in a famous court case at the Old Bailey in 1960, we have had actual sex taking place on prime time television. What was once considered pornographic is now the bread and butter of everyday cinema. Glossy magazines discuss sexual matters in a way which would have horrified a previous generation. The advertising industry feeds off sexual images, suggestion and innuendo. Our children are taught about sexual positions and anal sex by the agents of the state in our schools; and so endlessly on.

All quite harmless and healthy, some people might say, but is it? The public desensitisation to sex in this way attacks the dignity of people as spiritual beings who are something more than mere animals indulging their appetites like dogs in the street. Sex as the private, intimate expression of love and human worth has become the public expression of our debasement. What was considered a release of private individuals from insufferable state restraint has far-ranging public results which affect everyone, results which include the decreasing respect shown by the state for its citizens.

And so it goes across the spectrum of human experience: permissiveness about criminal activity, where the criminal is held to be a 'victim' of economic and social circumstance, rather than being assumed to know right from wrong, has helped a collapse in moral standards and awareness at every level of society, thus helping to bring about an exponential growth in crime which is barely contained by ever increasing police measures, both public and private.

April 2006

These include an alarming growth in intrusive surveillance techniques which is making the nightmare vision of George Orwell's 1984 a looming reality. The moral collapse has resulted in the disappearance of the concept of personal honour and integrity in public life, so that guilty cabinet ministers do not disappear to expiate their sins in a lifetime of good works as John Profumo did, but are brought back again and again to office.

The relaxation of the divorce laws, the slackening in the force of ideas of fidelity and trust, the punishing burden on fathers who are divorced by their wives and the state's contemptuous destruction of the rightful privileges of marriage are helping to destroy the family, the bedrock of our society, causing endless individual misery and social dislocation and opening the way to further state control of individuals' lives as the state assumes the males' role as provider for 'single mums' and the upbringing of their children. Relaxation of the immigration laws and multiculturalism is in the process of destroying the sense of identity and social cohesion without which no society which relies on implicit trust, cooperation and goodwill between individuals can function, undermining the common will to sustain collective projects from the state itself, through the National Health Service to the most local and personal level. Community spirit is declining everywhere, and people no longer exhibit the desire to look out for their neighbours that they once did. No wonder a widespread dream is to live in a traditional village, where such a spirit might still survive.

Abortion was once a crime in most circumstances, now it is available on demand. The killing of life in the womb has been one of the greatest single assaults on the value and dignity of human beings and opened the way to the undermining of the last taboo: euthanasia.

We do not have euthanasia in this country yet, but it is creeping in by the back door with the introduction of the Assisted Dying for the Terminally Ill Bill 2005. This measure sounds and is well-intentioned and has support even among the churches. But it is an attack by the state on the inviolability, the sanctity of human life, which has been a guiding principle of our society since we began to call ourselves civilised. And the state, and therefore the rest of us, is to be co-opted into private decisions to commit what is actually suicide by making doctors face prosecution if they refuse to allow patients to die in accordance with living wills, instead of trying to save them, in contravention of the Hippocratic Oath. Once again traditional morality is to be stood on its head and society is to be dragged down in surrender to the myth of individual autonomy.

DUTCH DISASTER

The experience of the Netherlands is instructive in this respect. In the Dutch experience we can clearly see the process of incremental steps leading to disaster.

Euthanasia has been allowed in the Netherlands since the 1970's, subject to certain rules. Doctors had to act on the free, explicit and repeated request of the patient. So while voluntary euthanasia has been officially sanctioned, non-voluntary euthanasia, or murder, as it should be plainly called, never has. That is the theory. The practice, however, is far different. Over time, the Dutch became desensitised to euthanasia just as the British have become desensitised to a host of other liberal practices. In 1984, the requirement that the patient should be terminally ill fell by the wayside. In the so-called Alkmar case a 95-year old non-dying lady had been killed by her doctor at her own request. The physician was not convicted of murder, the Supreme Court ruling that he had a duty to relieve his patient's suffering and that in order for him to do so it was necessary for him to comply with his patient's request for euthanasia.

This case leads the way to the institutionalising of euthanasia. The Dutch Medical Association and the Dutch National Association of Nurses draw up formal guidelines for it. These guidelines comprised five conditions which were subsequently endorsed by the Chairman of the Dutch Health Council in 1989:

- 1) The patient must have requested euthanasia
- 2) The request must have been well considered
- 3) The patient must have expressed a persistent desire for death.
- 4) His or her suffering must be unacceptable
- 5) The physician must consult with another colleague

When the Chairman of the Dutch Health Council endorsed these guidelines in 1989, a further condition was added:

- 6) Euthanasia must be a last resort, i.e. other alternatives must be considered and found wanting.

April 2006

FSID

These guidelines look impressive, but there was no way in which they could prevent a patient's requests being made under pressure, and the disturbing fact is that most such requests in the Netherlands come not from the patients but from their families.

The condition that requests for euthanasia should be well considered has also been lost. In 1990 a survey in the Netherlands showed that 13% of patients were killed within one day of their request, 35% within one week, and 17% within two weeks. Further 22% had made only one request.

All this is truly alarming, but even more so is the fact that the acceptance of euthanasia on request has led to the acceptance of euthanasia without the patient's request, to non-voluntary euthanasia. In 1989 the Dutch Supreme Court acquitted a doctor who had performed euthanasia on a child born with Down's syndrome. The Rummelink report of 1991 stated, following a survey that granted anonymity to respondents, that in 1990, 1,000 patients received lethal injections although they had not requested euthanasia. The van der Val and van der Maas

Report of 1996 showed similar figures for 1995, when 900 patients died from lethal injections without having requested them.

In 1994, the Dutch Supreme Court declared that psychological suffering was a valid reason for euthanasia. It ruled that there were physically healthy individuals whose unbearable suffering warranted euthanasia. In the Dr. Chabot case, a 50-year-old divorced woman was killed by her psychiatrist, Dr Chabot, on the grounds that she was seriously depressed following the suicide of one son and the death through cancer of another. Dr Chabot was eventually convicted, but this was not because he had killed someone on grounds other than physical health, but because he had not consulted another colleague.

The state of affairs in the Netherlands came about because in the last analysis, when a Doctor is asked to euthanise, he will not do so if he does not think it is warranted - in short the decision rests with him, not the patient. So he feels entitled to exercise his judgement in this way when the patient has not asked for euthanasia.

The euthanasia experience of the Netherlands is an object lesson of the way in which once the restraints of tradition are done away with by well meaning individuals, liberal measures lead to hell by small, incremental steps. In this case, liberalism has brought about the very results it accuses the Nazis of - human beings are being killed if third parties who do not think them fit for life. Liberal worship of individual autonomy has resulted in contempt for the individual.

If we in this country are living in a sleazy moral mire, a truly decadent society, once euthanasia gets under way in this country things will get even worse. And the more that human life and dignity are undermined by liberalism, which claims to elevate the individual, the more our 'representatives' will feel entitled to treat us like animals, to be herded and goaded by political correctness and corralled and watched like a herd of recalcitrant cattle.

» Roger Pearson, one time editor of "Mankind Quarterly" wrote "Shockley on Eugenics and Race" in 1992. This synopsis of Pearson's work on the genius who also invented the transistor has been prepared by Peter Davis.

» The highest aim of science, its ultimate goal, is the search for truth. Without uncompromising dedication to this noblest of ideals, a scientist can have no reason for being, no purpose for his existence, in effect, no religion. It is dogged determination and attention to detail that has driven thousands of men and women through the ages tirelessly to apply the Scientific Method in the pursuit of that absolute. Civilisation is not advanced by the likes of you and me, working at our everyday job. No, advancement is made by a few great visionary thinkers like Pythagoras, Newton, Darwin and Einstein. William Shockley was one such giant in the Ascent of Man. It was his invention of the junction transistor, for which he received the Nobel prize in 1956, which led to the founding of Silicon Valley in California.

In the later years of his career, this exceptional physicist developed great expertise in the fields of raceology and dysgenics, or "negative evolution". This was an interest that had been kindled during military service in India during World War II. He was acutely aware of the misery that overpopulation had caused in India yet no one had considered the quality of the population. Then in San Francisco in 1963, a teenager with a very low IQ of 60-65 had been hired to throw acid in the face of the proprietor of a delicatessen. It turned out that the assailant's mother also had a very low IQ, just 55 and she could remember the names of only 9 of her 17 illegitimate children! Could it be that IQ was inherited? That idea was not new but what was not generally known was that there was uncomfortable evidence that showed that people with a low IQ tended to reproduce faster than those with a higher IQ. The reasons for this are a complex mixture of genetic, environmental and social factors. However, what makes it possible is our modern welfare state which offers an open ended and unconditional commitment to support the mother without even the hint of a demand that she should take responsibility for her actions.

With his superb mathematical brain, Shockley saw immediately that, if IQ were inherited and not environmentally determined, then the inevitable consequence dictated by probability theory was a gradual decline in the quality of the human population.

It has been well established that the IQ of a child is not simply the average of that of its parents but that the IQ scores of each successive generation tend to regress to the norm. The norm or average for typical white American society is about 100. So a child who has gifted parents, both having an IQ of 120 will, on average have an IQ not of 120 but of half way between 120 and the norm, i.e. 110. Extremes of IQ, both very low and very high, are rare chance occurrences which nature tends to iron out over the generations. Therefore, over time, the average IQ of the population as a whole becomes an important consideration. If the average is declining, the chances of a genius arising is less and the number of gifted souls in each successive generation will decrease.

INHERITANCE FACTOR

Shockley could see all this all too well. The key to it all was to know for certain the extent to which IQ is inherited or genetically determined, its "geneticity". There was a huge body of evidence that suggested that IQ was about 80% genetic and 20% environmental. Nevertheless, the "nature-nurture" argument persisted, with most sociologists, psychologists and politicians refusing to even contemplate the idea of inherited IQ: to do so would infer that the thrust of their whole life's work would have been misdirected and in vain. Shockley was a physicist, not a psychologist and so was not involved in the field work of gathering demographic data. However, he re-examined the existing data with fresh eyes and brought to bear his skills as a mathematician.

It may be fair to say that many of the researchers in the bio-science fields did not fully understand the statistical significance of the data they had created. There were apparent anomalies and discrepancies between the studies of different psychologists which fuelled the nature-nurture controversy and allowed uncomfortable conclusions and their consequences to be conveniently forgotten. In some cases, Shockley's mathematical genius reconciled these apparent anomalies and misinterpretations and showed that different data sets were actually in accord. The inescapable conclusion was that IQ was about 80% genetic and only 20% cultural or environmental. Much of this evidence came from studies of twins. Dissenters pointed at apparent exceptions such as the identical twins Gladys and Helen whose IQ's differed by as much as 24 points.

However, Shockley showed that if he were right and IQ were 80% genetic, then such an exception was just exactly what probability theory predicted. In other cases, in much the same way as he had discovered the transistor, he made predictions from theory and then showed that experimental data was an exact fit. There could be only one conclusion.

Despite this overwhelming evidence, Shockley did not insist that he was right but rather urged Government and the Scientific Community to instigate a detailed programme of research into dysgenic trends and to start thinking about some way of encouraging low IQ individuals not to bring babies into the world who would be disadvantaged by an exceptionally low IQ. These dysgenic trends were a problem for all Americans but were most acute for blacks. The reason was that at that time (1966), the average number of children per family was 2.4 for skilled white and 3.7 for unskilled white. However, for blacks the numbers were 1.8 for skilled negroes and 5.3 for unskilled so that on average, fewer intelligent black children, and more less intelligent ones were being born. Moreover, this reproduction differential was in keeping with reports which showed blacks performed less favourably in IQ tests. Shockley argued that this would give rise to an underclass of people, genetically enslaved by a low IQ who would thus never be able to rise from the ghetto. In such poverty, a woman's best chance of happiness was to have a baby and hence the cycle perpetuated.

MARXISTS AT WORK

Shockley's suggestions and research findings were treated with unbridled outrage. At that time in America, the Civil Rights movement was in its hey day and the influence of Marxists on University campuses and on the press was pervasive. Leaving aside the racial aspect, it might be thought axiomatic that people in skilled professions, whether black or white, would on average be of higher intelligence than those in less skilled professions. However, this concept was too much for the entrenched dogma of the left. If low social and economic status is due to IQ, then it implies that those with a high social and economic status have a right to be there by dint of a superior IQ. This was anathema to the Marxists. They clung to the belief that people at the bottom of society were only there because they were exploited by the rich and powerful. With true equality of opportunity, everyone would be equally successful.

Secondly, there was the racial aspect. In his public speaking engagements and media interviews, Shockley tried to get across his point that dysgenics, if real, were a problem for all races in society and warranted further investigation. However, interviewers and critics only wished to see the word "race."

The evidence he had amassed challenged the environmentalist theories favoured by the liberal left who had secured billions of dollars of welfare funding on the back of false assumptions. Numerous establishment figures tried to discredit his findings by showing that black-white differences were all the fault of a disadvantaged upbringing.

Shockley soundly disproved these counter arguments one after another by reference to the mass of data that was then available but had often been overlooked or misinterpreted. For example, Native American children, (who are largely of Asian descent) were distinctly disadvantaged compared with black children. They came from much poorer homes and yet scored far better on IQ tests than black children. When they failed to defeat his meticulous scientific arguments, the left-wing establishment began to attack Shockley personally, suggesting that he hated blacks, was opposed to welfare and was in favour of creating a master race as the Germans had tried to do during World War III!

Shockley was not opposed to welfare funding but argued that society must investigate whether there really was a dysgenic trend from generation to generation in order to make valid judgements about public spending. To what extent was poverty the result and not the environmental cause, of low intelligence? He said that politicians and scientists needed to think about population quality and control or eugenics. Could poverty be gradually diminished by means of eugenics? To set the ball rolling he suggested an outline scheme for voluntary control of birth rates in which people would be allocated "child credits", rights to bear children which could be used or bought and sold. This may not have been very practical but was put forward as a "thinking exercise."

Shockley's findings were opposed by the Civil Rights Movement

Shockley, a good, honest, straightforward scientist, felt that his fellow members of the National Academy of Sciences could not fail to acknowledge the need to investigate further the potential time-bomb of dysgenics. He was wrong. His attempts at raising discussion were blocked by bitter hostility orchestrated by a small but vociferous group of leftist scholars. Spurious arguments were used by scientists and government officials to block research into these fields, particularly the geneticity of IQ. They usually took the form of "thought blocks" which prevented enquiry with hackneyed phrases like "there is no way to tell"; "nobody knows"; "any inquiry is felt to be dangerous"; "this is not a proper subject for enquiry."

In response, Shockley presented his coup de grace. Developments in DNA testing meant that it was possible to determine the extent to which the genes of an Afro-American were from white ancestors. Studies showed that the typical black American was between 10% and 30% white. It was agreed that blacks performed less well on IQ tests than whites. Shockley now showed that, up to a level of 30%, there was an increase of approximately 1 IQ point for every 1% of white genes in the test subjects' DNA. Different races exhibit different average intelligence and different variance or spread, as shown in the graph above.

SHOCKLEY HAD TO BE SILENCED

Whether they were 10% or 30% white, Afro Americans still perceived themselves as black and so did society. Hence racial prejudice or poverty could not be the cause of the black IQ deficit on test scores. There could be only one possible explanation - genetics. Despite the fact that Shockley had proved beyond all reasonable doubt that the geneticity of IQ was about 80%, the liberal left refused to accept the truth. Shockley had to be silenced, at any cost.

The left stepped up their attacks. Universities were threatened with disruption, riots and a consequent huge policing bill if they honoured their commitments to allow Shockley to speak. The liberal press accused him of being a Nazi. Fellow scientists who may have supported him were bullied into silence for fear of the loss of their position and livelihood. His views were deliberately misrepresented in the press. Even apparently respectable publications such as the Washington Post and Time Magazine misquoted him and distorted generally accepted and established facts to fit the image of Shockley that they wished to portray.

Communists put up “wanted dead or alive” posters of him while others burnt a Shockley effigy in the street. University administrators caved into the pressure and denied Shockley a platform to speak. At the same time, Shockley was attacked by the religious right who adhered to what he called “the Apple of God’s Eye Obsession”, AGEQ. Adherents of AGEQ held that God created all mankind with equal dignity and equal potential. This was another taboo which prevented objective research.

Until the end of his life in 1989, Shockley believed above all things that “the truth would set you free.”

His established status as a Nobel laureate gave him the strength and financial security to continue his quiet exposition of the facts in the face of determined, vociferous and illogical attacks on his character and on his scientific findings.

So are Shockley’s predictions coming true? Certainly there is some evidence that IQ scores, though not necessarily intelligence itself, are increasing and this is known as the Flynn effect. Conversely, other evidence suggests that dysgenics could be a reality. We cannot know because the establishment refuses to ask the question and when evidence of racial differences is found, it refuses to tell us. For example, work on the Human Genome Project, reported in the New York Times of 27 October 2005, identifies a remarkable number of genome differences between the races. However the research team advises that such information should be suppressed: “We urge conservatism and constraint in the public dissemination and interpretation of such studies, especially if non-medical phenotypes are explored.”

Research taboos still abound. In the UK, the BBC carried a report of the Health Commission on 7 December 2005 which showed that black people were more than 3 times as likely to be admitted to mental health hospitals than the rest of the population. The obvious question to ask would be “could there be a genetic reason?” However, it was immediately assumed that racism was to blame and that other types of treatment were not being considered. Health minister Rosie Winterton said “racism or discrimination in any form have no place in modern health or social care”. Thought blocking taboos regarding race are still rampant.

RELEVANT TODAY

This book should be read by anyone living under the yoke of political correctness. It contains truths that we all need to know. The man who proudly calls himself black can learn that he probably is actually part white. After growing up with burning feelings of resentment he can learn that perhaps black failings are not all the fault of white prejudice. Society as a whole can consider the merits of current welfare programmes from a more informed standpoint. Although much of the empirical data in the book is based on studies which may be up to 60 years old, they are still as fresh and as relevant today. They have also been re-confirmed by research published after Shockley’s death.

However, the most important message in this book, the most moving story, is not concerned with the details of raceology and eugenics. It is the story of how one man stood alone against the Establishment. Not since Galileo dared pronounce that the Earth revolved around the sun and not vice-versa has one man been persecuted so much for speaking the truth. It is a salutary tale for anyone who has ever failed to get a politically incorrect letter published in the local newspaper, any British politician arrested in the dead of night by the thought police, any Canadian free-thinker imprisoned for daring to ask “why?”

This is a lesson more fresh and relevant today than it has ever been:

“The truth shall set you free.”

The Smoking Ban

April 2006

Freedom of Choice?

» Derek Adams of Manchester gives a publican's viewpoint

» Members of Parliament have once again shown their utter contempt for the British public by voting for the draconian non-smoking bill.

The consequences of this Act will be to close many pubs and clubs which are already struggling to survive.

In a free society, government has no right to interfere in such areas of our daily life. I am a non-smoker, and would even point out that I can't stand the smell of tobacco smoke. However I am also a publican and I know that ninety per cent of my regular drinkers also happen to smoke.

This is probably the case in most working class areas, as for some inexplicable reason smoking and drinking seem to go hand in hand.

Speaking from a commercial point of view, if there really was a popular demand for non-smoking pubs then surely some wise investor would have opened a pub chain to cater for just such a market?

The only group to have attempted such an experiment last year by banning smoking in all its pubs was forced to climb down after just two months when their establishments were left deserted!

ULTERIOR MOTIVES?

Just like other British institutions the Public House has been around for hundreds of years, so what gives these privileged dictators of Westminster the right to destroy such traditions in one foul swoop?

The pubs and working men's clubs of Britain are the only places left where people meet socially to discuss current events and occurrences. They are the first places where any dissent with our governing elite is aired. So for a ruling cartel who want to destroy any opposition and to stop the public talking amongst themselves, the obvious answer would be to close down these meeting places, and believe me that is just what this smoking ban will do.

Some people would argue that if the above theory was correct then surely the government would lose revenue. This would not be the case as people would merely choose to visit one of the numerous off licences (many of them Asian-owned). There they would stock up with their favourite tipple, twenty fags and go to their armchair in front of the TV. Once seated and with no one telling them they can't smoke they would watch various anti-British propaganda offerings from the Bangladeshi Brainwashing Corporation.

In fact, contrary to the view that revenue would be lost it would in fact be increased. The few publicans who try to survive and carry on trading will be harassed by council officials sneaking around their bars and waiting to issue a two thousand five hundred pound fine to any licensee unfortunate enough not to notice someone smoking in their pub.

PERFECT RESULT

From the Government's point of view a perfect result! They have effectively closed down public houses by stealth. They have suffered no loss of revenue as the goods are merely being sold in a different place. They have quelled any dissent by effectively stopping people discussing daily events of interest and as a bonus they have us all sat in front of the most dangerous piece of brainwashing technology of our age, the TV.

This is the stark reality of the smoking ban, another British tradition will be lost forever and the public will just take it on the nose. If the government were sincere about wanting people to give up smoking then why not merely ban smoking totally? We all know the answer to that question, it is Money.

One other little point that should be noted is that our employees in Westminster, our sleazy little politicians, our Stalins-in-waiting, have made one or two exceptions to the ban. One of the places excluded from the smoking ban just happens to be the bars at the Palace of Westminster. How very convenient.

You WILL Have the EU Constitution

Last year saw much rejoicing amongst those who recognise the threat posed to our sovereignty and democratic rights by the European Union when its plans for a full European Constitution were rejected by French and Dutch voters. This euphoria was misplaced because, rest assured, in another two years the European Constitution will be in force, unless the BNP and UKIP, as the only true opponents in this country, can do something about it. And should the squabbles amongst UKIP's leadership lead to a major split it will leave just the BNP to try and awaken the people to the fact that we just cannot afford to ignore what is happening with the EU "because it is boring".

Since last year's rejection by French and Dutch voters the EU has been carefully putting through many of the policies and institutions that make up the proposed Constitution. These include the External Borders Agency, the European Public Prosecutor (who would have priority over our own politically correct judiciary), the Charter of Fundamental Rights, the European Defence agency, among others.

According to Daniel Hannan, a Conservative MEP writing in the Daily Telegraph 20th March 2006, other outstanding items will be formalised at a miniature inter-governmental conference, probably next year. "There will be no need to debate them again: all 25 governments accepted them in principle when they signed the constitution 17 months ago. We shall then be told that these are detailed and technical changes, far too abstruse to be worth pestering the voters with."

Some of us who oppose the EU do so not because we are "anti-European", in fact our present fight is motivated by the recognition that culturally and racially we are of Europe. The natural desire to work closely together that followed the appalling bloodbath of two major European wars and to prevent their reoccurrence made the concept of a European Union readily acceptable. However, it soon became apparent that it was not the democratic idyll that the people of Europe had hoped for after the totalitarianism of the Nazi and Communist regimes. In fact it becomes more like a sanitised Soviet system with the passing of each month.

This is best explained by some of the comments made last month by a former Soviet dissident, Vladimir Bukovsky in a speech he made in Brussels, in which he called the EU "a monster" that must be destroyed before it develops into a fully-fledged totalitarian state.

Mr Bukovsky said: "In 1992 I had unprecedented access to Politburo and Central Committee secret documents which have been classified. These documents show very clearly that the whole idea of turning the European common market into a federal state was agreed between the left-wing parties of Europe and Moscow as a joint project which Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev in 1988-89 called our 'common European home'.

He added: "It is no accident that the European Parliament, for example, reminds me of the Supreme Soviet. It looks like the Supreme Soviet because it was designed like it. Similarly, when you look at the European Commission it looks like the Politburo. It does so exactly, except for the fact that the Commission now has 25 members and the Politburo usually had 13 to 15 members. Apart from that they are exactly the same: unaccountable to anyone, not directly elected by anyone at all."

Immigration Is Out Of Control

The Government's total loss of control of Britain's immigration 'system' and asylum seekers in particular was revealed in the highly critical Commons report that said it would take up to eighteen years to remove all failed applicants. The Home Office has lost track of up to 283,500 failed asylum seekers and only knows where a quarter of them are living. Amazingly, not one MP has suggested that this quarter, for a start, should be rounded up and deported to the country from which they last came.

The lack of action is blamed on the Immigration and Nationality Directorate, whose responsibility it is to removed failed applicants. Although it now employs 2,000 staff, the IND only returned 14,250 unsuccessful asylum seekers last year, in spite of the headline seeking claims by Blair and successive Home Secretaries over eighteen months that they would "tighten up" on illegal immigration in response to the advance made by the BNP. Last year's figure in fact was considerably down on the 17,800 removals made in 2003-4! Commenting on this lack of action, top asylum judge Sir Henry Hodge told MPs that attempts to rid the country of bogus immigrants were being undone by government failures. The judge was giving evidence to a Home Affairs select committee.

Further evidence of the fact that the Home Office now turns a blind eye to the realities of the immigration disaster came up in the recent trial of the Chinese gangmaster found responsible for the death of 21 Chinese cocklers. Lord Carlile, QC, (no friend of ours) claimed that for years Home Office ministers and Immigration Service officials turned a "Nelson eye" to the exploitation of Chinese cocklers. They knew they were being smuggled in illegally and they knew, too, that they were housed in overcrowded, often insanitary conditions. Yet because of the difficulties involved in repatriating them officials connived in what amounted to a "deliberate and sustained" policy of acquiescence.

Returning to the Commons report on the lack of real action in deporting bogus asylum seekers, it was revealed that 403 foreign nationals released from prison in recent years have not been deported. Nationally, 10,237 of the 75,290 prisoners currently held in the country's jails are foreign citizens. In London's Wormwood Scrubs jail, more than half of the prisoners are foreigners, with Nigeria followed by Somalia making the top contribution. All should be immediately deported on completion of their sentences.

The Assault on Free Speech

Last month saw Leeds University's administrators buckle under pressure from Marxist students and the iniquitous Commission for Racial Equality and suspended a leading academic lecturer, Dr Frank Ellis, from the University. He has as much chance of being re-admitted to his post by the time this issue of Identity is published as I have of being knighted for long service to nationalist politics (with or without a bribe).

Dr Ellis is an expert in Russian literature in the department of modern languages and culture and is well liked by most of his students. He is also a former special services soldier. However, some numbskulls squeezed out of the typical university Marxist sausage machine objected to some of the views expressed by Dr Ellis in the student newspaper. He told Leeds Student that he was a supporter of the late Enoch Powell, and that the British National Party was useful as "a canary" to warn the Government of views on multiculturalism, which was doomed to failure because "it is based on the lie that all people, races and cultures are equal and that no one race or culture is better than any other".

To make matters worse, and bring forth the racist witch hunters from the Commission For Racial Equality, is that Dr Ellis had earlier also said that he agreed with the findings of the authors of The Bell Curve and other American scientists that the average IQ of people of African origin is lower than that of Europeans which in turn is lower than East Asians.

He was also criticised by some of his Marxist numbskulls and CRE mongrelisers for this gem of wisdom in an article on the internet in which he states: "It is considered politically incorrect to say so, but were one to take the 'white' and the 'male' out of science and technology, one would have no science, just witchcraft, Third World squalor, misery and mega-incompetence."

How many journalists and TV commentators will take up this latest assault on freedom of speech? Possibly Rod Liddle, but there will be few others. It is interesting to note, that in 2000 there was a red students campaign to expel Dr Ellis and also BNP student Chris Beverley (who now runs Excalibur). This was defeated by Leeds Uni's Free Speech Society, headed by Mark Collett, who Chris then signed up to the BNP.

Betrayal Of The NHS

Old Labour was justly given the people's thanks for putting our National Health Service into practice after their great election victory in 1945. One of its chief architects, Aneurin Bevan, must now be turning in his grave. Hospitals up and down the United Kingdom are now debt-ridden, with many having to close wards and sack nurses and junior doctors - most of whom are British born. Perhaps the worst affected, and whose tragic problems have been dominating the media, is the University Hospital of North Staffordshire. It has laid off

1,000 workers, including 250 nurses, as it tries to tackle a £15.5 million deficit. Nationally, it is predicted that job losses in the NHS could rise to between 15,000 to 20,000 this year. Probably all of us have at least one member of the extended family who can now tell of the sometimes third world treatment they are now getting at their local hospital, and particularly older people who have spent a lifetime paying in for their health treatment.

New Labour's answer to the mounting problems of the NHS, which have been getting progressively worse for the last twenty years, has been to throw money - our money - at it. It now receives over £100 billion a year. The Tories have, with some justification, drawn attention to the bureaucracy and bad management that has made its contribution to the financial crisis facing the NHS. The public service union Unison, which most health service workers belong to, commissioned an expensive report which came up with the conclusion that it was "perverse Government targets" and "contradictory" policies that were responsible for the problem.

In this PC age none of the Establishment parties or unions will make a statement of the bloody obvious. Important as the bad management and bureaucracy factor is, the resources of our Health Service just cannot cope with the drain imposed by the free-loading of the world's health service tourists, and the inundation of inner city surgeries and hospitals by asylum seekers, guests workers, one-legged Romanian roofers, or who else wants to draw upon what was once the envy of the world without putting one penny into its upkeep.

Furthermore, why is it only the BNP which points out the hypocrisy of stealing third world nurses and doctors to staff our hospitals at cut rate salaries whilst British born nurses and junior doctors cannot find employment?

New Christian Council Defends Traditional Values

The Christian Council of Britain (CCoB) was set up earlier this year to act in defence of traditional Christian values, methods of worship and to campaign for the right of Christians of all races in Britain to express their beliefs and values. It is not denied that some of its supporters among a wide variety of Christians of all denominations are also BNP members, but contrary to the statements of some liberal "official" church spokespersons, the CCoB is not a BNP front. We are told that its members who are also BNP members are in a definite minority, despite what the press may say.

The CCoB has people of other, but non-liberal Marxist, political persuasions, who have recognised that Christianity is in crisis. Congregations are falling, church buildings falling into disrepair and/or being converted to use as mosques, elders are divided on issues of women vicars and homosexual ministers, and all denominations are facing a powerful rival in the proselytising brand of militant Islam. Its opponents in the churches are the same people who have been in the forefront of following a political agenda of their own in forcing multiculturalism into sermons and RE lessons and effectively transforming the Church into a vehicle of liberal-left, even Marxist, politics.

LETTER OF THE MONTH

>> The Threat From Islam Is Real

Are we crying wolf when we warn of the threat to our people posed by Islam? Are we over-reacting? I think not.

Let us imagine an homogenous Muslim state, once a great power and having won two great wars, but in consequence of which having fallen upon hard times. At first a trickle of Christian Europeans began to arrive seeking work; then they began to form colonial enclaves amidst the increasingly resentful native population. To accommodate their growing numbers, the Islamic government began to pass a series of laws to protect the newcomers and to outlaw any form of political resistance by the indigenous people. As a consequence this alien wedge began to expand and its political and cultural demands rose exponentially, and soon the newcomers demanded that the emblems of the Islamic faith be removed, together with anything else that these unassimilable intruders were offended by or objected to.

Need I go on? No. For these events will never come to pass as no Islamic state would display such contempt for its own people or manifest such a bizarre death wish. Self-hating multiracialism is a white man's disease and it is killing our way of life and the future we and our children have a right to enjoy.

>> Marxist Murderers Forgiven

According to a recent survey on BBC Radio 4, Karl Marx is the greatest ever philosopher. I couldn't agree less with this verdict, which shows how brain-washed people have become.

It also shows how the tired old left/liberal ascendancy still adheres to its hoary old dogmas, accepting them without question in spite of all the evidence. The middle-class intelligentsia's love affair with Marx is by no means extinct.

But then again, when was open and honest discussion ever a quality of the left, when they could believe their old cliches? More recent evidence, for example, shows the magnitude of the destruction caused by the Marxist Chairman Mao in China. This man was a monster, responsible for even more deaths than Stalin, never mind Hitler. Yet still in parts of China you can see Mao's image publicly displayed.

Can you imagine the outcry if images of Hitler were still on street corners in Germany as a "little nostalgia" for the past? This shows the double standards and hypocrisy of the left. In Russia some people with short memories still hark back to the idea that perhaps "Uncle Joe" Stalin was not such a bad chap after all!

>> Private Education

With reference to your comment in February Identity about the privately educated having "gained their education through the privilege of their parents' money", I do not agree with you on this point because my parents were not well off, but made great personal sacrifices to put me through private school. We had no holidays abroad, no new cars and lived in a modest house and wore hand-me-down clothes.

I feel that a fundamental point of principle has been overlooked, namely that people should have the freedom to spend their money as they choose. Also, because of my parents' efforts, a place was made available in the state system, thereby saving public resources.

I do hope that you will take this into consideration, because, contrary to the general assumption, not everyone privately educated is a well-off David Cameron!

Keep up the good work!

>> Hard Line On Iran

Your February article on 'Iran - Stay Out of Trouble' raises many interesting and valid points. However, I can't see how keeping out of Iran's business will help prevent them from destroying non-Islamic countries, of which Britain is one (just).

If a country has both the will and capability to destroy its enemy, it will certainly do so in time. Do we then remove the will power by bowing to Iran's demands on us or do we preserve our non-Islamic culture and physically stop them getting the means (nuclear weapons) to annihilate us?

Israel and the USA may be above us on the priority list (being more

Satellite Power

» As part of the BNP's 'Peak Oil' programme of assessing what Britain's future energy policies should be in the face of declining fossil fuels, Lindsay Steele, a former nuclear engineer, looks at the long-term potential of satellite solar cells.

» As the world continues to search for clean and sustainable energy sources in order to combat global warming, it is becoming apparent that few energy sources are capable of providing power as cheaply and conveniently as fossil fuels. In the absence of a clean renewable energy source, the industrial nations will soon be forced to switch overwhelmingly to fast-breeder nuclear reactors as a means of producing energy. This prospect is not an appealing one.

Nuclear reactors concentrate both energy and radioactivity to a very high degree and there have been accidents in the real world of clumsy, error prone people. The worldwide abundance of such reactor plants and more importantly, the materials and skilled nuclear engineers required to construct and operate them, will inevitably be used to forward nuclear weapon programmes in rogue nations. Even if sound engineering, integral fuel cycles and deep waste disposal can be used to solve the safety issues and nuclear waste concerns, the problem of nuclear proliferation will always remain. Such reactors will produce large quantities of plutonium; from which nuclear weapons can be made in large numbers.

There is simply no way of guaranteeing that such technology will be used responsibly. In nations such as China, India, Pakistan, North Korea, Iran, Brazil, Britain, France, the United States and the Former Soviet Union, the development of nuclear energy has gone hand in hand with a nuclear weapons programme. If the worldwide development of nuclear power continues and that source of energy becomes the principle source for the entire world, approximately 70,000 large nuclear reactors will be operating by the middle of this century. Every nation, whatever its history, national or regional problems, or political stability, will have a stock of these reactors. For many, the idea of diverting some small amount of nuclear material into a weapons programme will be quite attractive. Although I was trained as a nuclear engineer initially, these arguments appear to be sensible to me.

NUCLEAR FUSION

Nuclear Fusion, as distinct from conventional nuclear reactors, might eventually be used to produce a great deal of our electric power. After five decades of research by industrial nations, the achievement of a practical and working Fusion reactor is now within sight. The ITER nuclear fusion plant, currently being constructed by an international team of physicists from Europe, the US, Japan and China, is designed to demonstrate a break-even thermonuclear reaction. But this energy source is likely to be very expensive, at least initially. It would also produce high-energy neutrons, from which weapons grade Plutonium and Uranium 233 could be produced.

Renewable energy, as received at ground level, cannot be used to provide the energy that is required to power an industrial economy. Such energy sources vary erratically with the weather and this would see entire industries close during 'low-energy' periods and massive over-capacity within the system at many other times. The economic losses would be immense and the cost of such energy systems is a great deal higher than the cost of conventional fossil fuel or nuclear energy sources.

Solar power, as received at the Earth's surface cannot be used to power our industries unless we are prepared to pay up to ten times more than the present price for our energy. These sources would require enormous amounts of power storage capacity, such as fuel cells and flow-batteries and the need to employ this storage would increase the price of electric power many fold.

But there is another option for producing renewable energy, one that simply involves lateral thinking. The one thing that all of the power options considered so far have in common, is that all are bound by the subconscious convention of the power plant being on the Earth's surface. Is there any reason why this has to be the case? Why not simply put solar cells in space where the sun always shines and then, transmit the generated power to the Earth's surface using radio waves?

Satellite power is perhaps the ultimate in renewable energy sources. A large satellite in geo-stationary orbit 22,000 miles above the Earth's surface, would gather solar energy converting it into electricity. This electric power is then transmitted to an Earth-based receiver station via a tight beam of high-frequency radio waves. The receiver station is simply a large circular grid of cables, several miles in diameter. It could be built in a remote area (over farmland which could still be used for agriculture beneath an elevated cable network) or alternatively, built out at sea. The radio waves would induce an electric field within this cable network, producing electricity.

The technical difficulties associated with constructing satellite power systems are large. However, the potential advantages of this system are enormous. The satellite can be made extremely large, enjoying enormous scale economies. In space, a structure does not have to withstand large external forces such as wind loadings and is free from gravitational forces. A solar power satellite can therefore be made to be extremely thin and lightweight. In zero gravity, such a satellite would take a very long time to wear out. Due to the lack of any gravity, such a system is likely to be very structurally efficient. A concave solar mirror capable of concentrating as much energy as is produced by burning a million barrels of oil per year, would be about the size of a football pitch and would weigh no more than a family car. A satellite capable of producing 10,000 Mw of electric power (13% of total UK electricity requirements) would weigh no more than 100,000 tonnes.

HIGHLY EFFICIENT

In space, high above the Earth, the satellite is exposed to the full strength of sunlight (1400W/sq metre) at all hours of the day. The only interruption to supply occurs within occasional solar eclipses, which take place at entirely predictable intervals. For 99.8% of the time, the satellite is exposed to the full-uninterrupted power of the sun. The solar radiation density of the satellite is much higher than we could expect for any Earth-based solar collector. Each square metre of satellite surface is exposed to an enormous 12,250 Kwhr's of solar energy per year. A similar solar panel located in southern England could be expected to receive about 1/12th as much energy (and this would be received at very intermittent periods, requiring power storage). Satellite power would provide a fairly flat and unvarying power output, with power available consistently at close to 100% of the time. We therefore do not need to provide any back-up power supplies or energy storage systems.

Satellite power could therefore provide much of the world's energy, at a price that is competitive with fossil fuel power plants. If electricity were cheap enough, it would be possible to electrolyse water to produce hydrogen as a fuel for road vehicles, ships and aircraft. Electric power could also be used to provide heating.

However, the technical difficulties associated with building satellite power systems should not be underestimated. To begin with, the sheer size and mass of satellite power sources allows no possibility of building and launching such systems from the Earth's surface. The cost of launching 100,000 tonnes of satellite power components from the Earth would bankrupt the world's leading financial institutions. In order for the proposition to be practical, solar power satellites must be manufactured in space, using materials mined from the surface of the moon or the asteroids.

We would therefore only need to lift into space the people, tools and equipment required to mine the necessary materials and produce the satellites. The cost of developing the required heavy rocket vehicles, setting up the required mining facilities on the moon, electromagnetic launchers on the lunar surface, space factories in high-Earth orbit and developing accommodation for a space workforce of at least several thousand people, is estimated by NASA and the US Department of Energy to be about £100 billion in modern money.

The hundred billion pound figure is interesting. It is not a sum of money that any nation would spend lightly. It is about the same amount of money that the UK has 'given' to the European Union in the five-year period between 1999 and 2004. In short, it is an investment that many nations (including the UK) could afford if the cost were spread over a period of a decade or so and if we could be reasonably confident that the investment would yield returns.

What sort of returns can we expect? Energy production is one of the largest global industries, accounting for approximately 5% of global GDP as of 2002. This is equivalent to £1,000 billion per year. What is more, many emerging nations, China especially, are growing rapidly and their demand for electric power is likely to increase steadily for decades to come. Even a 1% share of the present global energy market would ensure a return on investment of 5-10%. Unlike other renewable energy sources, there is no effective limit on the total available energy that can be extracted from satellite power. It would be possible (though never desirable) to cover the entire Earth with receiver stations. It is reasonable to expect that the supply of such satellite power systems could be extended for many decades to come, in order to meet any demand that is placed by the market.

If the economics of this system prove to be as good as many experts have predicted, the nation (or collection of nations) financing the project, would quickly find themselves to be the world's greatest exporters of energy products. For a nation like the UK (with a GDP of £1,000 billion), a 20% slice of the global £2,000-£4,000 billion energy market of 20-30 years time, would be a very nice earner indeed.

SPACE-BASED INDUSTRIES

The development of satellite power by the UK or any other nation (or collection of nations), would also give that nation a full set of space-based industries. In exchange for a £100 billion investment (spread over perhaps 5-10 years), the nation(s) would have a fully manned mining facility on the surface of the moon and an actual factory in space, with a full time workforce of several thousand people, initially. The facility and workforce would grow enormously as the Earth-based markets for its chief product expanded. Some of the output of that factory could obviously be utilised to produce other space assets. In addition to producing power satellites, we could for example, use some of the metals and silicates from the ore refineries, to produce large spacecraft capable of transporting thousands of people from low-Earth orbit to the moon, to the orbital factories and to destinations like Mars.

Such a spacecraft would be impossibly expensive if we attempted to launch it from Earth. But manufactured in space, from steel, aluminium and other materials produced from ores mined from the surface of the moon, it should be relatively affordable. Such a spacecraft could function much as an ocean liner would do on Earth. All that we would need to do is park it in a low-orbit around the Earth and launch its passengers into space using a large heavy-lift rocket.

Such a rocket might carry between two and five thousand people into space at a cost of perhaps £100,000-£200,000 each. This is a lot of money, but people expecting to work in high-Earth orbit will probably earn at least that much in one year. Such a ship could be easily propelled using a solar-powered linear electric motor. This would use electric fields to accelerate pellets of slag, rock or some other waste material in order to produce thrust. Accelerating at just one ten-thousandth of one gravity, the spacecraft would reach the high-orbit industries, close to the orbit of the moon within two weeks. More distant destinations, such as Mars, could be reached within a journey time of perhaps one year.

Initially, the space stations housing the high-orbit workforce will be somewhat cramped. As the space workforce approaches a population of perhaps 20-30,000, we can think about housing these people in a more natural environment. It is easy to imagine how this might be done. We would take a small portion of the iron or aluminium metals, which are produced by our power satellite factories and build a hollow sphere of metal, perhaps 500 yards in diameter.

This sphere could then be pressurised with oxygen to perhaps one third of atmospheric pressure. Oxygen is produced as a waste product as a result of smelting the metals from lunar ores. We would then rotate the sphere in order to produce artificial gravity on its inner surface. The internal surface area of the sphere would be quite large (almost 200 acres for a 500 yard diameter sphere). We would aim one of the rotating axes of the sphere at the sun and use a set of mirrors to reflect sunlight through a window at the opposite axis. A sphere 500 yards in diameter might house 10-15,000 people at comfortable urban population densities. Using moon rocks and slag from the space factories, we could produce soils, which would be fertile after the addition of water and nitrates. Within the spherical habitat, we could build ordinary houses out of brick and stone. Clustering the houses into small, dense villages would allow much of the space within the sphere to be devoted to parks and woodlands. A river could be made to bend around the equator of the sphere. In order to protect the inhabitants from cosmic radiation and small meteorites, a thick layer of slag would act as a shield around the outside of the metal sphere. A large number of smaller (unshielded) vessels attached to the outside of the sphere could be used to grow the food eaten by the inhabitants. Such an environment would produce a reasonably Earth-like living space for people choosing to work in high-orbit power satellite facilities.

Of course, the usable area inside the sphere is proportional to the square of its diameter. A sphere 3,000 yards across at the same population densities, will have sufficient internal surface area to comfortably house up to half a million people. It is unlikely that this many people would be living in space until at least a few decades after the beginning of the satellite power programme. Such a habitat would probably have its own weather systems, its own 'global' variations in climate, ecosystem, topography, etc. It would also weigh 20 million tonnes without shielding and its cost would be measured in many hundreds of billions of pounds. Such a project as this will almost certainly not be attempted until many years after the beginning of the program. But smaller habitats, perhaps 300-500 yards in diameter could be constructed even quite early within a satellite power construction project.

Most people will never be able to afford holidays in space. The nature of the hardware required for launching people and materials into space is such that it will always be relatively expensive to do, even with the most exotic future technologies. However, using very large, cheaply manufactured rocket vehicles (built from aluminium alloys in ordinary shipyards and launched from the surface of the sea) it is conceivable that the cost of getting into space might be reduced to a hundred thousand pounds per person (with sufficient scale economies). The key to building such rockets economically is to use the simplest technologies and materials available, such as pressure fed engine technology with very few moving parts and ordinary steels and aluminium alloys for construction.

In order to gain the benefit of scale-economies, we would also make our rockets extremely large, up 1,000 ft long, lifting perhaps 1,000 tonnes of payload and many thousands of people into space with a single launch. It is not unreasonable to assume that perfectly ordinary people, from ordinary backgrounds, will be able to obtain a bank loan for £100,000, if they were prepared to work in space-based industries for a period of at least a few years. After a few years work, those people could either choose to stay in the high-orbit industries, they could return to Earth (very wealthy) or they could travel out to a colony on Mars, the asteroids or some other planet along with thousands of others using an electrically powered space vessel like the one described previously.

The truly extraordinary realisation of this scenario is that all of the technology required to open the space frontier to ordinary people and provide infinite cheap energy to the entire world, is available today and the project could be carried out at a cost that is affordable to many nations.

None of the existing three large political parties would be prepared to offer an opportunity like this to the British people. I believe that this is one of the most promising and exciting projects that a future BNP government could undertake. Few other projects would open so many new human possibilities at such an affordable cost. And the sooner the BNP win power, the sooner it can all happen.

No 'Honours' - only Honour!

The disgrace of the main parties over their sordid sale of 'honours' to big business backers is another nail in the coffin of the rotten Establishment.

Now they plan to pick taxpayers' pockets for state funding of political parties – 'respectable' ones that support the multicultural white genocide machine!

Whether it comes to big business bribes or money stolen from ordinary taxpayers, the BNP is shut out. We like it that way, because it means we're in nobody's pocket.

So where do we get the money we need to fight elections and build the power-winning machine we need to put an end to such corruption? From people like you giving so generously.

Yes, I understand that donations from proper supporters are the only proper way to finance election campaigns. I enclose...
